Tracy is a supervisor at NGDC and going through a child custody battle with her ex-husband Joe. She can no longer afford the expensive private school tuition for their daughter Terry but Joe will only pay for it if she surrenders custody to him. Joe is financially well-off and still bitter about the divorce. He previously installed a key logger on Tracy's MacBook Air to monitor Terry's online behavior and now has motivation to monitor Tracy as well. Pat, is a corrupt detective with the D.C. Enforcers Bureau. He is very devoted to his sister and niece, walking the line of legal/illegal very closely. Carry is an acquaintance of Tracy who has family ties to Alex, who are both Krasnovian supporters. Alex initially contacted Carry to orchestrate the defacing of artwork because she is aligned with Krasnovia and because she has 'connections', referring to her slight familiarity with Tracy as friends/acquaintances and her technological savvy.

Conclusion

Evidence found on Tracy's iPhone indicated the following:

Tracy conspired with her brother Pat, under the respective aliases of Coral and Perry, to steal stamps from a museum exhibit to defraud insurance for financial gain. Her motive was financial as she expressed concern about tuition cost to her estranged husband Joe (Appendix A, Article 14). Pat used his position as a police officer to exert control over a third party, King, and coerce them into helping with the heist. While Tracy did provide Carry with access to the museum along with shift change information for museum security in exchange for compensation, the evidence gathered in this report does not indicate that Tracy was aware that the flash mob was a ruse to deface museum art.
